there is no mathematical formula to determine at just what point in an [inflationary] [uncertain] spiral we pass the point, of no return" Deficit financing almost inevitably means inflation because the government has to finance the deficits either by printing money or selling treasury obligations to the banks, both of which increase the amount of currency in circulation. If, at the same time, we do not have a corresponding increase in the supply of goods and services, we will have inflation, which means cheaper dollars."

The federal government for many years has lived on deficit financing while giving the people the illusion of expanding security, through Lib- [eral"] [uncertain] welfare programs costing [billions] [uncertain] of dollars. At present the dollar is worth half the value of a few years ago. Whether the point of no return has been reached can only be answered by the actions of individual citizens. They can still turn back.
