AMERICAN LIFE
INTERPRETED

Striped trousers and silk hats no longer are the trademarks of the United States. Blue jeans, blouses or sweaters characterize some 2000 young Americans selected to tell the story of the youth of more than 20 foreign nations.

In place of ribbons across their chests, these young interpreters of every-day American life wear letters awarded by their schools for parties, student activities, instead of diploma portfolios, they carry letters of commendation, extra points, or honor books, water color paintings and 1600 brushes, or boxes of crayons. These are the youth of the United States, the youth of the world, the youth of the International School Art and International School Music programs of the American Junior Red Cross.
