INTEMPERATE OF SPEECH IS INTEMPERATE MIND

Fulton J. Sheen in Houston Chronicle

Socrates said: "Speech that I may see thee." Speech is the index of the mind and the summation of a soul, all that the person has been, is, and will be. We need only hear a "sane" man say: "He is a proud man," "he is a kind man," "he is a cruel man." The whirlwind of the tongue is the sign of the temper in the soul. If there is envy in the heart, it will show in the tone of the voice; if there is love in the heart even the words share the glow. But a skunk in the collar soon emits up the whole house. It is a physical impossibility to develop the art of conversation without first developing the art of being a human being.

Certain restrictions are imposed upon speech. The power of edifying speech increases with the improvement in morals. Many of the suggestions offered today for the refinement of the art of conversation are in reality nothing else than the art of deceit and amount to "flow" to disguise your feelings. "How to please when you want to damn," "How to compliment when you want to condemn," "How to influence people when you hate them."

Words are to be judged in two ways: by their transparency and by their purpose. Words should be like windows. We should be able to see through them. They should not be like curtains which veil the inside of the mind from the outside of the head. An equal sign should always be made between what is in the mind and what is on the lips; if we cannot make the equation, the words should be thrown away. There is hardly a human being who has not at some moment of life, come face to face with persons who never said what they meant, or never meant what they said. Many others, on the contrary, so spoke that their words were like open doors to their hearts; they really meant what they said. Speech also has morality. Speech is a vehicle for the transportation of ideas, as an automobile is a vehicle for the transportation of persons or things. We judge the morality of a vehicle by the purpose for which it was made. An automobile used to transport a person to a hospital is a vehicle for good; a vehicle used to transport a person to a bar is a vehicle for evil.
